SOUTH KOREA:

Reaction to Infiltration Attempt

South Korean officials are talking tough after a North Korean submarine ran aground on the east coast yesterday. The director of operations at the Joint Chiefs of Staff called the incident a grave provocation, and a Unification Ministry statement said it was a direct threat to Seoul's security, according to press reports.

— The rhetoric probably is meant to preempt domestic pressure for a stronger response and avoid creating new obstacles to dialogue with P'yongyang. A midlevel Foreign Ministry official [] [] Seoul wants to "minimize" the impact on "already bad" North-South relations. []

South Korean leaders probably would be forced to take a harder line if there were violent clashes between infiltrators and security forces or revelations that P'yongyang was targeting South Korean leaders.

— The last detected infiltration involved two agents infiltrating by sea in late October. The media afterward sharply criticized President Kim Yong-sam for his efforts to improve relations with P'yongyang, and the incident coalesced public opposition to provision of additional food assistance to North Korea.
